Introduction

- In each country, sociology has developed in a special way, due to political, social and economic factors.
- The object of this research is the formation of a national school of sociology of management in Great Britain.
- The subject of research is the initial stage of the specified process
- The goal is to identify the main trends and features of the specified period

The degree of scientific elaboration and relevance of the chosen topic

- The absence, against the background of obvious interest in the general trends in the development of sociology in Great Britain, of special works devoted to the sociology of management
- Many modern sociological methods of studying social management began to be used within the British scientific school

Chronological boundaries of the studied period

- The lower chronological limit is the development of the concept and the conduct of empirical social research in the 17th century.
- The upper chronological limit is the beginning of the classical stage in the history of sociology (mid-19th century)

Preconditions for the birth of the British sociological school

- Great Britain is the first European country to embark on the path of parliamentarism and industrialization
- Strengthening the country's naval and commercial power, creating a colonial empire by it

School of Political Arithmetic

- D. Graunt (1620-1674)
- W. Petty (1623-1687)
- G. King (1650-1712)
- E. Halley (1656-1742)

School of Political Economy

- A. Smith (1723-1790)
- D. Ricardo (1772-1823)

Ideas about the principles of structure and development of society

- E. Burke (1729-1797)
- I. Bentham (1748-1832)
- R. Owen (1771-1858)

The first positivists

- J. S. Mill (1806-1873)
- H. Spencer (1820-1903)

Conclusions

- British sociology of management has a rich philosophical and scientific tradition
- These traditions contributed to the development of both theoretical and empirical components of sociological science.
- The work of British sociologists contributed to the development of sociology as an independent and structured discipline
